Magnificent Zebra Migration ...

Botswana's zebra migration is an almost unknown, wild spectacle that occurs annually in this southern African country. It's the longest single migration of animals that has ever been recorded, and it's an incredible sight to see first hand, as thousands of zebra kick up plumes of dust as they move from one grazing area to another. Every year, after the first decent rains have fallen in the central areas of the Nxai and Makgadikgadi National Parks, thousands of zebras embark on a trip of about 500 km round trip in search of greener pastures and better grazing. This migration of Zebras is the longest migration in Africa, even surpassing the annual migration of Zebra and Wildebeest in the Serengeti and Masai Mara Game Reserves.

This migration gives you the perfect opportunity to see scattered herds of Botswana's national animal. These herds can be seen throughout the Makgadikgadi palm belt and near the salt pans where the mineral content of grasses is highest. This is an important start to their journey. The nomadic journey made by the Burchells Zebra was misunderstood until a conservation team - Elephant without Borders - was able to track the migrational movements from the north of Botswana near Namibia, down to the salt pans of Nxai and Makgadigadi through Savuti. Scientists speculate that the zebras migrate to Makgadigadi because the grasses grown there have a higher content of protein and minerals when compared to the grasses of the Delta.
